Even in the time of Ugh, the creative cave man, there were productive and non-productive days. For example, there was the day that happened like this:

Ugh arose with the first light of day and went forth to find his breakfast. After a short search he found a fruit tree. The tree was loaded with bright red apples. Ugh, being very hungry, selected the largest apple on the tree for his breakfast. The only problem was the fruit he chose was at the top of the tree, and shaking the tree didn't bring it down. He picked up a large rock and getting directly under the apple, he threw the rock up. The rock went true and the apple fell to the ground. Ugh stooped to pick up the apple, forgetting the flying rock which descended and smashed into the back of his head.

With a splitting headache, Ugh ate his breakfast and then decided to gather some firewood. A short search convinced him he had used up all of the fallen branches in the vicinity of his cave.

"I will have to chop a tree down," he said to himself as he went to get his stone ax.

There were two trees near the mouth of his cave, a small tree and a large one. Ugh studied them. The small one would be the easiest to cut down but wouldn't give much firewood. The large one would give him a month's supply of wood but would take a lot of work to fell. He chose the larger tree and went to work. The tree was about three feet through so it would take several hours to cut down. At last the deed was about finished. One more swing of the ax should do it. With a mighty slash he cut through the last inch of wood.

CRASH! ! !

The tree fell right on top of the exhausted cave man. Crawling out from under the tree, Ugh, ignoring his aching body, chopped the tree up for firewood.

With his arms loaded with firewood he started home. He had forgotten he was on the other side of the small stream that ran through the valley. He tried to pick a shallow spot to cross the water. Finally he chose a portion of the stream where the water was smooth and unruffled. Stepping into the smooth water, all was well until his third step. ZOOOOOOM!! The water was about ten feet deep and the cave man sank out of sight. In his struggle to reach the safety of the bank he lost all of his firewood, and it was a disgusted cave man that crawled, wet and cold, out of the stream.

All he could think of now was to get back to his cave and take a nap. As he approached the opening to his cave he thought how wonderful home was. He entered the cave and was about to throw himself on his bed, when there was a roar from the back of the cave and a huge jungle bear attacked him. It was only with great luck that he managed to escape the creature that had decided to occupy his cave.

All through the cold night, Ugh sat on a rock in the open thinking about the day that had just passed. Little did he realize that he had discovered four great truths that would plague mankind through all eternity:

One . . What goes up must come down.
Two . . The bigger they are, the harder they fall.
Three . . Still waters run deep.
Four . . . Two objects can not occupy the same place at the same time.

It was a very productive day for Ugh, the cave man.
